Personal Values vs Professional Ethics vs Universal Morality in a Multicultural World David Cooper
PREFACE: This text is designed to fill an intermediate position between the professional ethicist and the student studying for a career in a profession. It is an unfortunate fact of modern academic life that the texts, which present the best ethical theories, are couched in academic jargon that makes them almost ccessible to the average member of society. This is not necessarily an oversight, because the moral philosophers at the leading edge of our discipline are writing for people with PhDs in moral philosophy. &, a moral theory that cannot function in the lives of ordinary citizens is a moral theory that is not quite doing its job on the practical level. Thus, this text tries to make the concepts and moral theories of philosophers like, Kant, Mill, Rawls, Habermas, and certain postmodern writers, accessible to citizens and those professionals who want to find a secular philosophical foundation for professional ethics. Of course, the citizen has to do his part. A person who is lazy about morality is not preparing to enter the 21st Century. Throughout our lives we need to increase our moral sophistication so that we will be prepared to deal with the nature of globalization and the conflicts that cross cultural, religious, and technological lines. Tribal societies shared a sacred protective umbrella of metaphysical moral certainty that was passed on from generation to generation in sacred tribal stories. Duties of station were clear and understood by all tribal members. But the good old days are gone. Multicultural, technological societies are confusing. Conflicting world views have shredded the umbrella of moral certainty, creating a collapse of moral confidence. The reactions to the plurality of world views has led to "isms" of moral exclusion that support the oppression of marginalized others.
