Black Market Baby: An Adopted Woman's Journey Renée Clarke

I was born in Canada in 1940. Pregnancy outside of marriage was a disgrace and young women who found themselves in such situations were whisked away and dumped into convents or hospitals. Babies were taken out of the arms of young mothers, often without their consent and sold to married couples. They were smuggled across the U.S./Canadian Border. Papers were forged or destroyed. They were called "black market babies." I was one of these children. Black Market Baby reveals my life growing up as an adoptee . . . with its inherent sense of rootlessness, abandonment and denial. It shows the difficulties of coping with the truth about my life and facing the realities of who I am . . . it is a story of discovery.
